nomy, and R. I. Throckmorton, assistant professor of soils.

The investigation was conducted for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not there was any foundation for the assertions that dynamiting would improve the physical condition of the soil and aid in acration, drainage and bacterial action.

The experiments were conducted at six different places in the state and on soils with heavy clay subsoils. They were planned to determine the effect of dynamiting on soil, the yield of crops, the moisture content of the soil, flors, the physical condition of the soil, the leaching of salts in alkali soils, and the growth and vitality of fruit trees.

The data collected showed that the
